TRAPPERS REMOVE GAME FROM AREA OF PYMATUNING

A preliminary report from game officials who have been conducting trapping operations in the vicinity of the Pymatuning Dam project in Crawford county, show that over 1000 cotton tail rabbits have been successfully removed alive as well as 150 quail, 300 squirrels and numerous pheasants. Nine trappers are at work under the supervision of Division Supervisor J. C. Gifford, of Oil City, and the Crawford County Game Protector, Ward H. Donor, of Meadville.

The trappers are working ahead of the timber-cutting area and 200 traps are in operation; plans are being made to use another 200 just as soon as the weather permits. The catch of game is increasing as the timber cutters advance and force the birds and animals further out of the swamp. A great many fox-squirrels also have been captured and in one instance eleven flying squirrels were removed from one nest. Although the flying squirrel is not a game bird it is interesting to know that these creatures still live in certain parts of the state. Trappers are working under extreme difficulty, due to the nature of the terrain, and the animals are more difficult to trap than they would be under more normal conditions.

Construction crews at the dam are lending their co-operation to the game officials.

Brace Weak Trees

Trees with weak framework are likely to split apart under the strain of heavy crops. They can be cheaply and effectively strengthened by bracing. Screw eyes inserted in the limbs 5 to 10 feet above the crotches, depending on the size of limb, can be used with a connecting chain or heavy wire to hold the limbs securely.

LOW COSTS HELP SCHOOL BUILDING

That a number of school districts in the State are planning building operations to take advantage of the existing low construction costs, is evident in reports issued today by the State Department of Public Instruction. At the same time it is apparent that some districts apparently are withholding building operations at a time when it is possible to realize a high return on the investment.

One outstanding indication of an upward trend in school house construction is cited by State Superintendent James N. Rule, who announces that the department has just issued a report on the plans and specifications for a $1,500,000 high school for Scranton.

Suggestive sketches for new and reconstructed buildings are being prepared for a number of the school districts and quite a number of requests have been received for inspections and recommendations for building programs.

Where the need for a new school building exists, Dr. Rule is of the opinion that careful planning, combined with prevailing construction prices, makes possible a sound investment for the community, stimulates business and instills public confidence.
