Baer's automobile, demolishing the machine.

On the stand, Baer testified that patrolmen flashed a red light and then whistled. Obeying the signal he came to a stop. A moment later the machine driven by Shank struck his automobile with such force as to push it ahead a considerable distance.

Shank in his defense claimed that Baer stopped suddenly and without giving him any signal of any kind. He had been traveling at a rate of speed of 35 miles an hour and was approximately 60 feet at the rear of the other car, Shank testified.

Despite this distance, Baer stopped with such suddenness that he was unable to avoid the collision Shank declared. The trial Monday was the second for the case, a non-suit having been recorded when it first went before a jury last December.
