

CANNERS AND KINGS

EOPLE are saying nowadays that there is plenty of everything, and that the only trouble is that our economic life is not so arranged as to make everything available to all. The canned foods industry is a direct contradiction of this contention. Take pineapple, for instance. Formerly only great lords and kings were able to grace their tables with that royal Hawaiian fruit. In Northern countries it was raised only under glass, and was not available, even to kings, fully ripened under the sun in its native habitat with all of its delicious fruit sugar, juices and nutritious qualities intact.

A Rare Treat

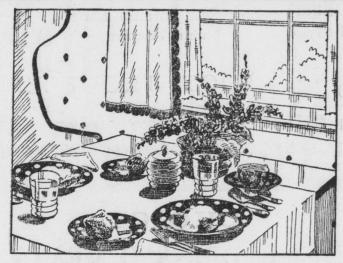

Move thanks to the canning in the canner consume such rare and dainty dishes as this one named after that famous grand opera star, Madame Melba. All the incans and within reach of the average purse. Here's the recipe:

Melba Salad: Hollow out slightly the centers of eight large canned peach halves, chill well, and then place in beds of crisp ettuce. Drain one No. 2 can of crushed Hawaiian pineapple, and add eight marshmallows cut in eighths and eight marschino cherries cut in quarters. Pipe rosettes

Now, thanks to the canning industry, it is available in this form, and the average man can feast with a red cherry. Serves eight.*

Better Breakfasts

"Spring in the world! And all things are made new."

HAT a perfect spring morning!" your husband says, as he looks from the table to the scene out of the window. And perhaps he thinks window. And perhaps he thinks that the weather alone is responsible for his exuberance.

But you know of some other things that have put spring into the picture. You know that you are wearing one of your new spring morning-dresses, that of two 3½-ounce cans of sardines on two spring morning-dresses, that of two 3½-ounce cans of sardines on the contents of two spring and less than the spring into the picture.
