Called Back

By COSMO HAMILTON

IT WAS the doctor who spoke. He said, "Pemberton, I have to tell you that your wife won't live through the night."

In order to hide his personal anguish and professional distress the doctor put into his voice a certain roughness. But as he stood in that dimly lit room in which the figure of Pemberton was bending forward with his face between his hands, he said to himself, "Oh, my God, where have we got to in medical science when such a beautiful thing must slip through our fingers in all the glory of youth?"

The doctor had been, and was still, desperately in love with Enid, and had not recovered from the sudden and utter collapse of his hopes when, having asked her to be his wife three years before, she had said these triumphant words: "But, my dear, haven't you heard the news? I'm going to be Mrs. Pemberton—the wife of Nicholas Pemberton, one of our country's greatest authors."

Since then he had resented Pemberton. For a considerable time he had not been able to bear the sight of him. Rumor had it, and he believed it to be true, that Enid and her husband were among the very few happily married couples within a radius of fifty miles of their old and charming home. During his concentration upon what had been of necessity nothing but a case, he had, however, tumbled upon something which pointed to the fact that there had been a skeleton in the most private cupboard of that old place.

And so, instead of leaving the room after making his statement, he shut the door and went to the fireplace. "Pemberton," he said, "there's something behind all this which is defeating me. Your wife is entering upon the crisis of her illness. In ordinary cases it would of course be touch and go although the odds would be with me. But in this case they are against me—heavily against me—because Enid hasn't the will to live. D—n it, she wants to die! This means—something, and I want to know what."

"It means that she wants to escape from me." "Escape from you. Why? You've loved her, haven't you. Haven't you done every mortal thing to make her happy?"

"Yes. I have loved her. I still love her and I've done every mortal thing, so far as I had the capacity, to make her happy with me."

"Well then—what do you mean?" "I must sum up my failure in two most terrible words—too old. To which I must add that she has been forced to divide me with my work. My work has erected a barrier between us over which she has never been able to climb. Before this illness hit her I stood here late one night and prayed to God that she might obtain her freedom from some decent fellow nearer her own age."

The doctor stood aghast. Out of the mouth of this reticent man came words that he had dragged from his soul. No wonder he was being defeated. "I must go back," he said. "She may want to die; you may want her to die, but, by Heaven, I shall put up a fight against death with all the strength I have."

He went to the door and came back. How he hated this man!

"Here's a note addressed to you. I found it on the floor. It must have slipped from under her pillow."

The note was addressed to himself in the round, and schoolgirl writing that he knew so well.

"Pemberton, my darling, you've dramatized all this. You've seen me with the eyes of a novelist from the very first. We haven't been living in life but in the pages of a manuscript. You have never been too old, as you have made yourself out to be. And if I resented your work because it took you away from me, each one of your books has been almost as much my child as it has yours. You know I loved you when I married you and I adore and admire you now, but you made up your mind that the story must end unhappily and it must. I can do nothing but die. But even when I am dead I shall sit outside your door and wait my love through the keyhole. I've done this every day since you married me, though you never discovered it."

You should have heard those creaking boards and seen the figure of that gaunt gray man as he plunged up that wide old staircase in a frantic effort to push aside that other gaunt gray figure which was standing by the bed!

"What do you want?"

It was the doctor who spoke, as the nurse rose to her feet.

"It's my fight," called out Pemberton, flinging himself on his knees and placing one arm with utter tenderness and sudden understanding over the faccid body that lay on the bed. "Enid, Enid, I love you. Make the end of this story a happy one by lying. Together we'll make a serial of this story which shall run on and on."

The little hand to which he had pressed his lips trembled and was withdrawn, presently to be placed like an inspiration on his head.

And although there was not a single creak from those old oak boards, Death went away from that house.
