NEW ENAMEL FINISH ON STANDARD CARS

The new enamel with which Standard Passenger Cars and Commercial Cars are now finished is known as Dulux or synthetic resin enamel and is the most durable finish yet developed.

One of its advantages is that it retains its lustre and appearance longer than any other finish.

It becomes dull very slow under exposure to the weather, but as this dulling is only a surface condition the original appearance can be restored with effort than any other finish.

Once on the body and even baked it is practically insoluble in even such fluids as radiator antifreeze alcohol has no effect on the surface.

With the better surface life, Dulux will not wear away under polishing as is the case with other finishes. Cleaners that must be used on any weathered car body remove a tiny film of the finish. With proper polishes on Dulux finish, only the weathered film is polished away.

Another advantage is that Dulux enamel is by far the most satisfactory finish to adhere to metals, and further it is made with a lustre so that when it is applied to the car body, it does not require a finish polishing, but has its own natural brilliance.

Two elements enter into the production of the synthetic resin used in making the enamel. The resin is made by combining glycerin with phthalic acid (manufactured from coal tar) and is most remarkable in its stability and the excellence of the enamels made with it.

Dulux has been used by the Ford Motor Company in finishing commercial bodies during the last year, and for nearly three years, in finishing colored wheels for Ford cars.

In the course of the research work which led up to the decision to use Dulux, panels coated with this material were subjected to weather tests in many climates. Tests of six months, one year and two years were conducted at Jacksonville, Fla., Frisco and Long Beach, Calif. and Cristobal, Canal Zone.

The climatic conditions of these places vary from the temperate summer and cold winter of Michigan to the hot, dry, Imperial Valley of California, and to the intense ultra-violet sunshine of Florida, broken only by drenching rains and dried off again by the intense sunshine.

During this investigation and research period, pyroxylin lacquer panels were also being exposed along side these panels and proved the superiority of Dulux.

As an accelerated method for testing, a "weatherometer" also was used in the Engineering Laboratory at Dearborn. This machine simulates weather conditions of sunlight and heat at 130 degrees. Rain and cooling by freezing in a regular cycle of such duration that 500 hours is generally equivalent to a year's tropical exposure.

From this it may easily be seen that the use of Dulux as a finish for passenger car bodies is in no way experimental.

Say! Who Owns the Highways, Anyway?

The modern highways were originally planned for the use of the private car driver, says the United States Supreme Court has declared this to be the law, and holds that any State may control or limit the use of its roads for profit.

The heavy truck, says the Association, should be regulated in the interest of safety and good transportation. This, it is stated, is the aim of the railroads. The Association denies that the railroads plan to increase the payments required of private car owners for their use of the roads.

On the contrary, it says, the rail carriers have repeatedly pointed out that if reasonable limits are placed upon the size of trucks, highway costs will be so reduced that in a few years private car license fees and other charges can be substantially cheapened.

A Sports Ensemble

EFFECTIVE ensembles may be made with a single frock as the foundation of a costume with a cape, a jacket, a scarf and beret set as its interchangeable accessories.

Golf or tennis devotees will be pleased with the casual cape that can be thrown over a sports dress. (McCall 7363). A jacket can also be ensembled with the same frock and as jackets are important to timely chic, the simple one with wide revers and broad panels has a definite place in a sport mode. (McCall 7379).

No smarter vogue has ever been originated than the summer one. And no modern tennis frock does without this feature. (McCall 7348). A beret and scarf set is all that is necessary to complete this economical sports outfit. (McCall 82). (By courtesy of The McCall Company).
