Trouble at the Mallams'

By JANE SPENSE

"JIMMY, it's two o'clock in the morning."

Jimmy's bride of four months came down from the landing to peer more closely at her spouse.

"Jimmy, you're drunk!" she exclaimed.

The up-to-now model young Mr. Mallam reared himself up indignantly.

"Drunk! Like h-I-I'm drunk!" Alice Mallam peered closer at her adorable Jimmy.

"You are drunk, Jimmy. Mummy says you're drinking too much," she declared.

"Oh, so your mummy says I'm drinking too much, does she? Your mummy says too d-d much." He managed to keep himself on his feet as he whipped up a rage against mothers-in-law.

"I've had enough of her. So mummy says I'm drinking too much. By gad, I won't stand for that. I'm a man!"

Mr. James Mallam rocked on his feet, steadied himself, and lashed out with a closed fist. It was a clean knockout. As a matter of fact the only knockout he had achieved in his life.

And the one time he had ever lifted his hand against the weaker sex, unless one counts that hot afternoon when at eight years of age he knocked his seven-year girl friend over the head with a croquet mallet.

His eyes gleamed with the satisfaction of a caveman at this stopping for once and all of mummy's interference. Then nervously this product of the present-day feminized civilization started to wipe sweat from her face.

Dazed and trembling, she leaned against the wall for support. At sound of the heavy, uncertain footsteps of her lord and master she came to life.

To lock her door.

Having protected herself against her household, Alice remembered the outer world. She stumbled to her bathroom and started the cold water tap running.

Although she had never before had occasion to treat a blackened eye, she resourcefully set about applying cold water applications.

"Alice, let me in," her spouse commanded. "I wanna go to bed."

"Try sleeping on the floor. I just waded it this morning," she lashed back.

Later she paced the floor. "The brute," she muttered to herself. She stumbled over his slippers and angrily kicked them out of the way.
