Pigeon Roost Settlement

Wiped Out by Marauders What was known as the Pigeon Roost settlement in Indiana consisted of several families that made a little community in what is now Scott county, says a writer in the Indianapolis News.

This settlement, founded in 1800, was separated from any other by several miles, and was confined to about a square mile of territory. On September 3, 1812, it was attacked by a band of about twelve marauders, said to have been Shawnees who, scouring the locality, going from cabin to cabin, murdered within an hour twenty-two persons—sixteen of them children and five women.

Prior to this general killing two men were shot in the woods. Most of the cabin homes were burned. A spirited fight in the house of William Collins, in which three Indians were killed, probably prevented a greater slaughter, as the rest of the settlement to escape to the blockhouses that stood within a few miles. Several spectacular escapes have been recorded. The news of the massacre was carried to Charlestown, Clark county, and by 2 p. m. the next day, 200 armed men reached the scene, where only one house remained standing. They took up the trail of the savages, but never caught up with them. Two children were carried away by the Indians, Ginsley McCoy, age three, and a boy, Peter Huffman. They were later returned to their people, but went back to the Indians afterward. In 1903 an appropriation was made by legislature for a monument of Bedford limestone, for the site of which was laid October 1, 1904, at the spot where the massacre victims were buried.

POULTRY

CHICKS BY SEX IS BEING INTRODUCED

Japanese Method Winning Favor in U. S.

By L. M. Hurd of the New York State College of Agriculture.—WNU Service. Chick buyers in a year or two may order their one-day old chicks by sex when they purchase from commercial hatcheries. A method of determining sex in chicks, developed to a science in Japan, is being widely introduced into the United States.

Federal Department of Agriculture experts are now teaching members of poultry departments of state universities and colleges the methods employed in Japan. Members of the poultry department at Cornell have already had such instruction and have tried it out in a practical way with much success on New York farms.

Male chicks may be separated from the females with 80 to 90 per cent accuracy by those trained in the Japanese method. In the future, farmers may buy only half the usual number of chicks to raise pullets for their laying flocks by purchasing only the females. This will help to reduce feed and equipment costs. The males may be sold to those who specialize in production for the broiler market.

The technique of determining sex in chicks may be learned in two days to a week, but a thousand chicks at least should be studied to obtain skill and speed.

Chick Piling Means Big Loss to the Poultryman

The piling of chicks frequently causes heavy losses. This habit is common with chicks ranging in age from two to four months, but is most disastrous with chicks just at the time heat is discontinued, says the Missouri Farmer. To avoid these losses often taxes the ingenuity of the poultryman. The danger ceases as soon as the chicks take to the roosts. To encourage early roosting, roosts should be installed at least by the time the chicks are six weeks old. These should be placed in the rear of the house only a few inches above the floor.

The losses from piling are due to the chicks on the bottom of the pile smothering or "sweating" which saps their vitality. Some poultrymen avoid piling by installing wire frames. For instance, a frame two feet wide running the entire length of the north side of the house frequently solves the problem. This frame, covered with wire netting, is sloped up so that the back edge is about ten inches above the floor. As the chicks crowd toward the corners they are elevated off the floor. This discourages piling, and if the frames are provided with a couple of 1 1/2-inch strips, they will serve as roosts.

Will Show Turkeys Dressed turkeys, both toms and hens, will be exhibited at the State Farm Show. Blood and feather dressed and full dressed carcasses will be entered.

Use Evergreen Trees

Irish juniper, arborvitae, pine, red cedar, spruce, or any other evergreen suitable for transportation in tubs can be used for outside decoration during the holidays.

Ration for Growing Flock

A practical ration for the growing flock of youngsters must be of a kind to supply materials for growth, bone structure and for reproduction. Such a ration contains plenty of digestible fats and carbohydrates, proteins of the right quality, enough minerals, some "ballast" or indigestible material and a supply of the highly important vitamins. Some of the necessary elements in such a ration are: yellow corn, wheat middlings, raw bone (calcium phosphate) grit (calcium carbonate) milk and salt (only a small quantity).—Wisconsin Agriculturist.

Separating Chicks

When cockerels should be separated from pullets in the flock of baby chicks depends upon the facilities available, but as a general rule the birds should be separated as soon as the sex is determined. The new quarters, however, should be well heated and the cockerels fully feathered before they are moved. Cockerels make a much more rapid growth than pullets and as a result, if the birds are not separated, the hopper and floor space will be crowded and make the chicks more susceptible to disease and cannibalism.

Colored Minorcas

Originally, according to some early writers, Minorcas were seen in a variety of colors and in recent times have been developed. Blue Minorcas are said to have been produced by crossing the black hens with heavy Andalusian roosters. There is no mention in poultry books of buff Minorcas or any others except as above mentioned, the tendency being to keep close to the recognized types, which appear to meet all demands.

Producing Quality Eggs

Eggs are such a highly perishable food product that they should be sold two or three times each week to a dealer who is equipped to handle such products. The efforts of producers to retain the original quality of eggs will be useless unless they market their products to some one who is equally interested in establishing an outlet for high quality eggs. Dealers who appreciate quality eggs are interested in having their eggs reach the consumers in the best possible condition.

Compete for Title

County farmers' horsehoe pitching contest winners will meet at the Pennsylvania Farm Show in Harrisburg next month to decide the state championship. The present state champion, who cannot compete this year, will act as judge.

Party Peas

PLAYBOYS and party girls are these familiar peas which you have probably been accustomed to think of as home-bodies. True they are at home on the every-day dinner table, but they are equally dashing and dandy in party guise. Serve them in some of these attractive dishes at your various Christmas week parties.

Christmas Candler. Cut tops from six very small tomatoes, or six canned Love Apples, remove centers, drain well and dust inside with salt. Mix one-half cup finely chopped celery, with one-fourth cup mayonnaise and mix one-half cup canned peas with one-fourth cup mayonnaise. Choose firm, sturdy asparagus tips from a 1 1/2-ounce can, and stand one upright in each tomato can-dleswick, packing around first with celery, then with peas to make it steady. Have the green peas on top to show. Put a small piece of pimento on the tip of each stalk to resemble the flame. Place in the center of watercrust wreaths on salad plates and serve with tiny lemon sandwiches. This serves six persons.

Peas with a Partner Cauliflower and Peas en Casserole. Separate one head of cauliflower into flowerlets and boil until tender. Drain and lay in a buttered casserole, keeping the pieces as unbroken as possible. Make a white sauce of three tablespoons butter, three tablespoons flour, one and three-fourths cups milk, one-half teaspoon salt and a few grains of pepper. Stirmer one cup of canned peas for three or four minutes, and pass through a sieve. Add to the white sauce. Pour over the cauliflower and cover with buttered crumbs. Brown in a hot oven. This comes eight persons.
