Brains Produce Wealth

By GUS W. DYER

Professor of Economics and Sociology, Vanderbilt University

When it is reported that a business executive is paid a salary as large as that of the President of the United States, we may expect someone to ask for an investigation.

The very general feeling that a large salary in business is not earned is due to a very general ignorance of the nature of production.

It is difficult for the average person to divorce himself from the idea that the production of wealth is almost solely a physical process. He regards production as the work of the hands, and hence gives small place to those who do no physical work.

As a matter of fact the effective production of wealth is pre-eminently intellectual rather than a physical process. It is the brain, not the hands, that is the great producer.

The production of wealth is only in a very limited sense a physical process. Workers in business may be divided into four classes — common laborers, semi-skilled laborers, skilled laborers and those who exercise the attractive faculty. The work of common labor is almost altogether physical.

The work of the semi-skilled is predominantly physical; the work of the highly skilled is predominantly intellectual; the work of those who exercise directive skill is altogether intellectual.
