FARMER IMPORTANT IN GAME PROGRAM

Aid Sportsmen With Wild Life Restoration Plan.

By JAY N. DARLING The key figure in any program of wildlife restoration in the United States is the farmer. The farmer controls that portion of the outdoors sought by the great majority of small-game hunters of the United States. Without a mutually beneficial relationship between farmer and sportsman, all conservation endeavor devoted to the increase of upland game fails of its at 12:30. prime object - the guarantee of sport to the general public.

It is true that the farmer has een the victim of the hoodlum type of hunter, and it is up to organized sportsmen to combat the evil of trespass on cultivated lands.

Excessive clearing and grazing have, at times, worked to the injury of the farmer through cutting down the supply of helpful wildlife. The drainage shark has promoted schemes that have impoverished the soil, lowered the watertable and wrecked the hopes of many a settler as well as destroying vast sources of wealth in fur, fish and wild fowl. Man's ceaseless war against insect pests would be lost were it not for the help given by birds. Rodent pests are kept down by birds of prey. In certain areas the skunk, a heavy insect feeder and one of the few enemies of burrowing grubs, is nighly important to agriculture. Oth-"vermin" may be vastly more helpful than harmful to the farmers. The assembling of source-materi-

Twelve leading live stock judges recently collaporated in setting up the Percheron standard, reported The Country Home Magazine. They agreed on medium size, short legs, thick bodies, heavy bones, short straight backs, deep ribs, long, level croup, heavy muscles, moderately straight hocks, and reasonably long, sloping pasterns. Such a horse has life, action and alertness, and he can turn around without breaking down a dozen hills of corn.
