New Parachute Device Tested for Air Liners
A method of dropping the passengers of an air liner like bombs and letting them float to earth by parachutes is being perfected by an officer of the Italian air force.

Believing that the parachute should be an integral part of air passenger transportation, and that its use in an emergency should be controlled by the pilot, one Lieutenant-Colonel Freri has devised a means of placing the entire responsibility of landing passengers by parachutes within the pilot's hands.

Safety hooks, worked by an electric mechanism, hold the seats and the entire cabin containing the passengers. If a desperate situation arises, the pilot orders his assistants to supply passengers with parachutes and put them on. By moving a lever he releases the passengers from the cabin, entrusting their lives to the parachutes.

The invention is now being tested in Italy and is expected shortly to become standard equipment on all Italian passenger liners.
