

Buried City to Give Up New Treasures

Spring, coming early to the picturesque Kentucky hills, has signalled the renewal of work at King Mounds, Wickliffe, Ky., where archeologists digging among the remains of an ancient buried city expect this year to unearth the greatest cache of treasures yet found at this site, the metropolis of an unknown and forgotten people. Experimental testing, according to Col. Fain White King, state archeologist, who with his wife, Blanche Busey King, ethnologist (inset) is in charge of the work, has disclosed a large mysterious area at the Signal Mound, high point of ground commanding the expanse of the Mississippi and Ohio rivers. Here, more than a year ago, was found the remains of a single individual, evidently a man of high rank in the ancient city. It is the hope that the newly located area may contain his complete personal and family treasures, jewels and ornaments, even the white ashes of their ceremonial fires—whose science has discovered and preserved. It is estimated that complete excavation will take another 10 to 20 years after which it will be housed under permanent stone buildings to preserve its record for education and posterity.

While the work progresses, thousands of visitors annually pass through the site to view these remains of a lost civilization—their burial tombs undisturbed for centuries, their dwellings, their implements, their treasures, jewels and ornaments, even the white ashes of their ceremonial fires—whose science has discovered and preserved. It is estimated that complete excavation will take another 10 to 20 years after which it will be housed under permanent stone buildings to preserve its record for education and posterity.
