Solar Periods

Rule Forecasts

Weather Predictions Based By Scientist on Sun's Radiation.

WASHINGTON.—There are 10 long periods in the radiation of the sun, each with directly observable effects on the temperature and rainfall of earth.

These effects, however, vary with place and season and there is some as yet unknown factor that complicates long-range weather forecasting.

These most recent conclusions from the work of the Astrophysical observatory of the Smithsonian institution were announced by Secretary Charles G. Abbot. They may bring a step nearer the day when useful weather forecasts may be made for several years ahead based upon solar observations.

The sun's radiation also varies irregularly from day to day. These variations attend the sun's 27-day rotation, for the sun's surface has hot spots as well as cold spots upon it. Columns of finely divided matter appear to bombard the earth and veil the sun slightly when such sunspots are exactly central. Thus both increases and decreases of the sun's radiation affect us as the sun rotates.

Cloudiness is a Factor. An increase in the output of the sun, especially if of short duration, does not necessarily mean an increase in the temperature of the earth as a whole.

Local conditions, such as cloudiness and location with respect to prevailing winds, have the most profound effects. In the past Dr. Abbot has been puzzled by apparent "changes of phase" in the weather effects of the long periods in solar variation. Almost precisely opposite weather results would sometimes ensue from the same solar phenomenon.

Recent work has convinced him, however, that this is explainable. It depends on the season of the year. For example, he says, take an 8 1/2-month period—one which he actually has found in the solar variations. Every time it recurs in the same season it will have the same effects at a given station, so far as itself is concerned. Other simultaneously operating solar variations may, of course, partially modify the effects.

Lists Solar Periods.

The solar periods now listed by Dr. Abbot range from 8 1/2 to 27 1/2 months. The latter, about 23 years, appears to be the major period in which all the others repeat themselves and the most successful long range forecasts to date have been based upon it. They have been reasonably accurate for two or three years in advance.

Dr. Abbot has analyzed temperature and precipitation records for Copenhagen, Vienna and New Haven for the past 140 years and found that solar periodicities continued with unaltered phase throughout this period. They were sufficient to account for all departures from normal temperatures.

Dr. Abbot gives examples of fairly successful weather forecasts for years in advance. These are made by finding the average effect of each of the 10 long solar periods on weather for 50 years back. These separate effects are then combined for the five years to come.

Sees Farmers Prepared For Big Role in Defense

WASHINGTON.—The nation received assurance from R. M. Evans, agricultural adjustment administrator, that American farmers would produce enough food and fiber supplies for use as "a weapon for defense and later in the peace negotiations to use as an instrument for building a new world."

Evans told the annual national AAA conference here that the triple-A farm-control program was so arranged that it could handle adjustments upward or downward as required for defense, thus making agriculture better prepared for the present emergency than any other industry.

Changes in Street Names Makes Life Confusing

BUFFALO.—Life is all rather confusing to Roland F. Bessel—and the local police is forced to agree. Appearing in court for failing to report a change in address on his driver's license, Bessel told at all only that the street's name had been changed twice.

"I couldn't keep up with the changes in the street name," the defendant said. "Even now there is another change pending."

"Case dismissed," sympathized the court.

Million Volt X-Ray Unit Takes Picture in Minutes

Taking a picture through four inches of steel in less than two minutes, a job formerly requiring an hour's exposure, is possible with the new million-volt X-ray outfit in the research laboratory of the General Electric company.

Through three similar million-volt X-ray units are in use in hospitals, this is the largest to have an industrial application. Just as the physician or the surgeon is able by X-rays to look inside the body of his patient, so engineers can look into the casting from which, for example, a huge turbine will be made. Defects which might cause failure of the machine, possibly with fatal results, are detected before there is trouble. Up until now, the largest industrial equipment in the world is a 400,000-volt unit in Schenectady, which the new apparatus surpasses.

With the 400,000-volt unit, three hours and a half were required to make a picture through five inches of steel. With the new one, only five minutes are required. The exposure time must be increased 2 1/2 times, per inch of steel to be pictured.
