Organized Red Cross

Clara Barton (1821-1912) was born in Oxford, Mass. She became a teacher and went to Bordentown, N. J., where she had a free school established in the face of strong local opposition. Later, when a man was installed as principal because some of the townspeople objected to a woman in a position of such importance she resigned and went to Washington. There she worked in the patent office, and when the Civil War broke out volunteered as a war worker. In 1864 she was placed in charge of hospitals at the front, with the Army of the James, and after the war she superintended a search for missing soldiers and identified more than 12,000 graves.

She went abroad and aided in military hospital work in the Franco-Prussian war and did relief work in several European cities. When she returned home she organized the American Red Cross, after the Red Cross in Switzerland, and became its first president. She directed aid in the Mississippi and Johnstown floods, and the Russian famine, and did field work in the War with Spain.

She collapsed in 1900 while working in the Galveston flood and resigned the presidency of the American Red Cross in 1904.

A & P Head Pays Tribute to Farmers

For Record-Breaking Food Job in '42

NEW YORK.—Major credit for accomplishing the biggest food job in history during 1942 should go to the nation's 7,000,000 farm families, John A. Hartford, president of the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company, said today.

America's farmers and their distributors supplied record quantities of food to our armed forces, our allies and low retail prices; and with a shortage of labor as serious as that confronting the farmer. Almost 15,000 of our own employes, for example, are now in the nation's armed services.

"Despite all these problems, the grocers of America moved food at less average cost than ever before. For example, our own company was providing food for our customers at the lowest gross profit rate in the history of the retail grocery business. This means that more of the consumer's food dollar goes for food and less for overhead than ever before."

"I wonder if the American public fully appreciates the difficulties under which the farmer labored," Hartford said. "Rising prices of farm supplies increased his production costs. Gas and tire rationing and other transportation restrictions made it difficult for him to get his produce to market. Shortages of boxes and storage space and fertilizer were big problems that had to be overcome. Restrictions on canning deprived him of part of his normal market."

"And most serious of all, the departure of 2,500,000 employable farm workers to the armed forces and industrial plants since 1940 caused a drastic reduction of the normal labor supply. In spite of all these obstacles, which might well have been considered insurmountable in normal times, America's farmers worked hard and long to exceed by 14 per cent the 1941 crop and by 12 per cent the previous record crop of 1937. And they have been called upon to do an even greater job in 1943."

Teamwork in War Effort

"I know that none of these record-smashing accomplishments would have been possible if it were not for the American capacity for teamwork. Nowhere has public recognition of the fact that our war effort is a cooperative enterprise been more evident than in the food field. In state after state, producers and distributors have been working out together more efficient, less costly means of moving food from farm to dinner table. Their task would have been much more difficult had it not been for the cooperation of the buying public. Consumers, bewildered at first by sudden food shortages, have now accepted rationing in good spirit as their contribution to victory."

"The accomplishments of 1942 are particularly gratifying because they promise even greater accomplishment in 1943."

Hartford asserted that a year ago the food industry had no proven pattern to follow in doing its wartime job but that today conditions are improved considerably.

"Today farmers and distributors have behind them a year's hard-won experience," said Hartford. "There is better public understanding of the factors necessitating changes in our buying and eating habits. Machinery has been established for the equitable rationing of foods when shortages threaten. Governmental control of the food picture has been established."

"The nation's 560,000 food retailers had to do this intensive wartime job with less than 100,000 employees."
