

Cockroaches Found Where Food Stored

Infestations Stopped When Habits Are Known

Cockroach infestations may be curbed by understanding the habits of the pests and approved methods of control, according to Dr. E. W. Lowrance of the department of biology and consultant of the agricultural extension service, University of Nevada.

Roaches are likely to establish themselves anywhere that food is stored or handled. They are found most frequently in old buildings, but new houses may be infested and overrun by animals inadvertently transported to them from outside sources.

The animals have a liking for starch-containing foods, he said, and have even been known to attack books. They seem to like the starch and glue in the binding.

Associated with a relatively heavy infestation of roaches, the consultant said, is a nauseating fetid 'roachy' odor.

This comes from an oily secretion in the scent glands of the animals. The oil is deposited on foods, dishes or any other utensils over which the animals may crawl. Because of their pollution of foods, he said, they may be classed as disease car-

Cockroaches are active at night, and, during the day, hide in dark, sheltered places. They can usually be found under baseboards, behind drawers, wall cabinets, and drainboards, and beneath flooring. Their hiding places can some imes be found by the sudden turning on of a light in a roach-infest ed room, which will cause them to run from their hiding places. To prevent roach infestation, the biologist suggests that all food supplies and the cartons or containers in which they are delivered be carefully inspected. If cockroaches are found, not only should they be destroyed but the carton should be burned immediately, as it may be infested with roach Windows and ventilators of buildings should be tightly screened, he said, food supplies should be stored carefully, and garbage removed as rapidly as it accumulates.

"Fumigation is perhaps the most effective way to eliminate roaches," the consultant said, "but this method is exceedingly dangerous unless handled by an

Walnut, maple and white oak are needed for war uses. Farmers should contact two or more buyers for offers on trees.

Experts in the fields of transportation and grain storage say that a great deal of grain will have to be held in farm storage for a period after harvest. Terminal storage will not be available to hold the crops at any one time.

SOYBEANS ARE NEEDED

Oil is needed for the war effort and high protein concentrates are in demand for livestock feeding. Soybeans produced by Pennsylvania farmers this year will help to relieve shortages of both, Agronomists of the Pennsylvania State College say that oil can be extracted from the beans and the meal used for feed.
