Illegal Collectors Almost Destroy Balata in Guianas

The Guianas, earliest source of balata, a rubber-like substance, exported three to five million pounds annually from 1910 to 1923. Meanwhile British and Dutch officials established regulations designed to keep the trees alive. They banned felling by the gum collectors and limited the extent of tapping and retapping. They licensed collectors and registered laborers. Forest rangers and land officers policed the industry. But regulations deep in the jungle were easily overlooked by workers paid for each gallon of production. Depletion of accessible trees is shown by the drop in Guiana production in 1940 to less than 800,000 pounds. Unrestrained by conservation laws, balata collectors attacked Venezuela's jungles in 1906 and for 15 years averaged over three million pounds of export balata annually. It is estimated that in this period they left nearly 40 million fallen monarchs to decay in the forest. Venezuela's 1940 export total was under 300,000 pounds.

By felling a mature balata tree, about three gallons of gum can be drawn off, producing 16 pounds of dried export gum. By restricted tapping of the standing tree it is estimated that a gallon of the milky latex yielding five pounds of balata may be taken every second or third year for many years.

Northern Brazil, untouched in the early years of balata production, recently has been the outstanding source. Brazil exported over five million pounds in 1940--about three-fourths of the year's total for all South America.

Tells How to Have Warm, Dry Winter Poultry House

Most of the troubles caused by wet floors in poultry houses during the winter can be avoided if preventive measures are started before cold weather begins. C. M. Ferguson, poultry husbandry specialist, Ohio State university, says that condensation of moisture from the air causes the wet floors. If the floor is well insulated with litter, both floor and litter will stay dry in cold weather.

Mr. Ferguson advises the use of straw, sawdust, or ground corncobs for poultry house litter. Several inches of any of these three materials should be placed in the house while the weather still is warm. Then, more litter should be added each week for six to eight weeks.

The litter forms an insulating blanket that is the same temperature as the air in the poultry house so moisture from the air will not condense on the litter. Bare floors or thin coverings of litter on the floor are about the same temperature as the air outside the house so moisture from the air inside condenses on the floor and accumulates from day to day.

Storage Stretches Tomato Harvest

When frost threatens, the supply of home grown tomatoes fresh from the vines can be kept coming for several weeks by pulling the vines and hanging them in a dry and moderately light storage place. Ripe fruits can be used at once, and the ones that are well developed but not ripe will be able to draw considerable food material from the vines to help them ripen and color.

If the gardener has a large patch with more vines than can be managed conveniently in the storage space available, it will pay to select the best vines for storage and then strip the green fruits from the other vines for use as green tomatoes in cooking and for pickling. Getting full food value from the last of the tomatoes is always good management and better than usual this year because it will conserve the canned supply.

'MORE' Is Shifted in Production

By changing the emphasis from "use MORE equipment," to USE equipment MORE, "American small farmers in battle array are inching ahead in the United Nations' effort to produce more food.

Two simple examples: Two farmers in Yuma county, Colorado, recently bought as partners a combine formerly owned by one operator and three Beadle county, South Dakota, farmers bought a thresher which had been owned individually. The object in each case was to get wider utilization of partly idle farm machinery. Co-operative use helps to "spread" machinery by getting it into service on several farms. This saves metal for war, and helps get the food job done despite a shortage of labor.

Pre-Christian Customs

Zoroaster lived in Persia at least six centuries before the Christian era, so the Parsis' religion shows little evidence of Christian influence, but has not the obstacles to conversion to Christianity found in the Islamic or Hindu religions.

Zoroaster was one of the first to advocate the worship of one god. His followers believe in life after death, resurrection of the body, and in prayers for the dead. They have their own calendar, with each day dedicated to a particular guardian angel.

They often are erroneously called fire worshippers because when in prayer, they stand facing fire or the sun, as the most appropriate symbols of their god. Parsi history reveals a hatred of idolatry.
