

A. & P. To Honor Founder Here

George Huntington Hartford, inventor of the modern chain store, will be honored here during the week Feb. 10-15 by The Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company.

Local observance of Founder's Week, announced by L. A. Mullen, vice president in charge of the company's operations in this area, will pay tribute to the man who opened the company's first red-fronted store in 1859.

"Mr. Hartford established the principle of mass distribution,"

Mullen said, "and down through the years this principle has proven a boon to the American people. The chain store has made everyday staples of many commodities which once were considered luxuries."

"More than ever in its 87-year history, the company's facilities now are being directed toward improving the supply, quality and variety of food. The return of more than 27,000 experienced employees of A & P who served in the armed forces is helping speed the installation of new departments and the expansion of shopping convenience.

"We believe there can be no better way to keep faith with our founder," said Mullen, "than by turning our attention to speedier transportation, more scientific packaging and refrigeration of perishables, improving the processing of food and eliminating waste and spoilage as factors in food costs.

The Hartford system, he pointed out, began with specialty shops selling tea, and later, coffee, spices and extracts at prices reflecting direct distribution. Before the turn of the century the shops became one and two man grocery stores. Twenty-five years ago A & P pioneered the sale of fresh fruits and vegetables. The company's "economy" stores then were expanded into "superettes", fore-runners of the modern supermarket.
