Job Is to Out-wit Weather When It Comes to Making Hay Without Sun

By IRA MILLER
Farm Electrification Bureau

Weather never remains neutral on the farm. It is either "for or agin" you. Rain can be of the welcome "million dollar" variety or the frustrating sort which starts just as you are bringing in the hay and continues for two or three days. Such a prolonged downpour has ruined many a valuable hay crop. For years farmers accepted such conditions as being beyond their control. They made or lost on their hay crops according to the whims of Old Man Weather.

Fortunately, the nation's agricultural experts became interested in the problem. They believed that something could be done to outsmart the weather and, at the same time, help farmers to produce a better quality of hay. Their research led to the development of several different types of hay curing systems. Of these, slatted floor and lateral duct systems predominate. Curing is accomplished by charging air through the hay. Usually, this is done by means of blowers or 36-inch fans, operated by horsepower motors.
Essentially, most mow curing systems start with a main duct which extends from the fan chamber through the center or along the side of the barn. Large barns may use two fans and two central ducts. In each case, air is blown into the central duct, and released through side openings under the slatted (false) floor in one system and into lateral ducts in the other system. Air passes upward through

IN APPRECIATION: To all my friends and neighbors, I take this way in thanking you all for the kindness you showed me during my sickness. I thank you for the many cards and comforting letters and the beautiful flowers which I appreciated so much. I thank our minister and his prayers and comforting words which meant so much to me. And visits of the members of the church, I must thank all my good neighbors for the many good things they brought me to eat. I am getting well slowly and by the help of God which has been so near to me during my sickness. I trust he will make me well again. Respectfully, Mrs. John H. Frye, Manheim, Pa. R2.
