Red Paint
By KATHLEEN GILCHRIST

THE blazing sun shocked the air into rippling waves of heat that emphasized the starkness of Ed Higgins' bare barns. In contrast to the unpainted barns was the neat little bungalow, with its bright green paint and white trimmings.

From behind her spotlessly curtained kitchen window Marty Higgins gazed outside. Her thin face looked drawn, but her cotton dress was as fresh as her kitchen. She shook her head at the memory of Doc's parting words that morning.

"I've done all I can, Marty," he'd said. "If Ed won't fight for himself—"

"I can't understand his giving in so easy." There was more disappointment than sorrow in Marty's voice. "Stubborn old fool, he gave me enough trouble any time I wanted him to do anything, goodness knows, and now to let pneumonia down him without a fight!"

The brown collie beside her raised questioning eyes. He cocked one ear expectantly toward the bedroom door behind which Ed lay, his sunken cheeks under unkempt whiskers mute evidence of the ravages of the first serious illness of his robust life. How unlike the gaiety of their courtship days!

"Twenty years, Rusty, and now when he's needed most he quits." Marty gazed past the ugly structures of naked wood to the wheat-covered vastness of prairie beyond. The sun was beginning to turn its greenness into the golden ripeness of harvest.

Rusty wagged his tail. It was seven years since he'd come, a furry pup, to live with Marty and Ed, and this was the first time in the battle that had started twenty years ago, when first Marty had stated her plans for a home.

"Painted buildings on a prairie farm. What's the matter with 'em the way they are?" Ed scoffed. "You don't hear my cattle wain't no barns with paint on 'em, do you, and they seem to manage."

"But I'm not one of your cattle, Ed, and I want a decent home with paint on it, even if they don't," Marty had replied with aggravating sweetness. "If you want to live with them, go ahead, but I'm having my home the way I want it."

"Just naturally, contrary. If I didn't want you to paint them, you would. You'd think that we were paupers instead of successful farmers," Marty often repeated in exasperation as one unpainted structure after another was raised to house Ed's increasing cattle.

The dog watched Marty carry the tray into the bedroom, to return with its contents scarcely touched.

The sun was sinking in a blaze of golden glory when she returned to the window, tinting even the bare wood of Ed's barns with a pearly beauty.

"Wonder what Ed would say if we painted them pink, Rusty?" The twinkle shining through the weariness in Marty's eyes suddenly sparkled. She crossed to the bedroom door.

"How're you feeling, Ed?" There was a challenging note but Ed, listless on the pillow, did not notice.

"All right, I guess."

"Ed," she said, "I've decided that since you're so set on dying, I may as well begin managing the farm my way now as later."

"Eh?"

"Yes, Ed, and the first thing I'm going to do is paint those barns bright red. I've stood them for twenty years for your sake, but if I've to carry on alone I'm going to do it my way."

"Over my dead body! Whatever gave you the idea that I'd leave you to run the place to suit yourself? Red paint, on my barns—" Ed lay back, sunken eyes flashing. Marty retreated. There was a sudden brightness in her eyes. Rusty stopped to lick the pale face of his invalid master before following. Ed's voice rose in angry protest against the added indignity.

"Red paint—drat you dog! Marty, bring me an egg-nog or something. Red paint! Time I got up to see that them barns are painted a respectable color—hurry up, I'm hungry!"
