Bruises on Livestock Reduce Meat Values High Number of Injuries Result of Carelessness

One of the less spectacular but nevertheless important factors contributing to the reduction of meat and livestock values is the waste of meat and lower grading of pork cuts because of bruising.

Tests made on 5,708 hogs indicate that the hams receive more bruises than any other part of the animal.

When the animals are driven they tend to turn away from the driver, which often results in their getting hit or kicked on the hams.

Most of the injuries are surface bruises, and many are caused by the driver kicking the hog or punching the animal with a cane, sorting pole, club, and gate rod or some other handy instrument.

Others occur when trucks are not flush with loading or unloading chutes and platforms and the legs of the hogs slip into the space between the truck and the chutes, scraping the sides of the shanks up to the cushion of the ham.
