"My Lord, who killed him?" asked the manager.

"Me, I killed him," grunted the Indian.

"Why did you do it?"
"Him spit in spring!"

THE LOW DOWN

HICKORY GROVE

Freight trains on the highway. Sisters and brethren, there is now a subject. Old Mr. Iron Horse is having hard going. Here he is buying a private right-of-way on which he lays costly track and on which he keeps up repairs at his own expense—and what happens. What happens. What, says Henry.

Well, I says, zooming along, parallel, is a competing highway freight truck, big as a freight car, running on a nice smooth pavement built by the state and the people.

New, owning no railroad stock, and wanting the owest freight rate possible, I am for whatever system is best and cheapest—in the long run. But as the highway freight trucks get bigger and longer and higher and my driving of my own flivver into town gets a little more risky and risky as the freight truck driver looks down upon me, I am beginning to lean to the idea that I better speak up while I can speak up.

If we allow unfair competition to wear old Mr. Iron Horse threadbare—and we wake up some mornning and the depot is locked, we will not be so calm and unperturbed.

Before the R. R. came to town, what did our burg look like—there is something important to ponder. It is no h-hum affair.

Yours With The Low Down.
