Crushing and Chilling Cause of High Mortality Rate Among Pigs

By IRA MILLER Farm Electrification Bureau Human beings have something to be thankful for, after all. Despite their various troubles, they still fare much better in this life than baby pigs. For studies record that the mortality rate among little porkers is one out of five during their first eight weeks on earth.

What are the causes of this terrific toll? Sixty percent are traceable to crushing by the sow—the balance to chilling. The latter results from the inability of all little pigs, in a large litter, to get close enough to the sow to absorb necessary body heat. For some years now, the use of electric lamps and reflectors, to keep young stock warm, has gained in popularity in all sections of the country, where artificial heat is required at brooding time. Not only is this method cleaner than heating the brooder house with coal or wood fires, but it eliminates considerable labor. With electricity, the farmer just flicks a switch and power takes over the brooding problem, giving pigs, chicks and lambs a healthier and faster start.

There are several simple, but highly effective and economical, brooding devices available. The most popular are standard or deep bowl reflectors equipped with cord and plug. These are hung in corners of the brooder house (figure 1), or may be used with hovers (figure 2). Hovers can be built of plywood or practically any type of surplus lumber around the farm.

For the poultry raiser, who markets thousands of chickens each season, there is a 10-lamp fixture using R-40 lamps, which will effectively supply light and radiant heat to a brood of 1,000 chicks, allowing able, the poultry and stock raiser can assure himself a greater profit with much less physical effort, and bring the greater part of his broods and litters to market within a shorter feeding period. Many farmers also report that electric brooding enabled them to save enough in lower feed costs, and obtain enough additional revenue, through higher early market prices, to pay for their equipment and lamps during the first season of operation.

plenty of growing space. Under these lamps, each chick absorbs enough radiant heat to eliminate pile up and smothering. Since economical equipment is available,

HEALTH HINTS for LIVESTOCK

POISONOUS PLANTS THREAT TO STOCK Poisonous plants cause American livestock raisers many million dollars in death losses and sickness each year.

Trouble of this type is more apt to occur among young animals—as young cockleburs, jimson weeds, nightshade, larkspur or young hemp contain specific poisons. Another large group of growing forage of the sorghum family such as Sudan or arrow grass and cane may contain prussic acid, especially if frozen, stunted or wilted. Other plants sensitize animals to the rays of sunlight, causing serious skin trouble or swollen heads.

One great danger is that spotty animal losses may be ascribed to poison plants when the true cause is some contagion like blackleg or anthrax. When doubt as to cause exists, skilled consultation should be sought at once.

If a livestock owner suspects that a pasture may contain poisonous forage he when cut down his risk by allowing one of his least valuable animals to graze there.

If the animal is unaffected after 10 days or two weeks, the pasture probably is safe. But as a double check, the owner should keep close watch on the animals. He should also keep antidotes on hand which he can give as first aid before the veterinarian arrives.
