People continue to get killed through avoidable accidents and the toll will continue as long as men exist on the globe.

Tough Job

WASHDAY along the streams of Central America as shown above, not only involves considerable back-breaking physical effort but is no doubt hard on the buttons and the life of the garments.

Such primitive methods of pounding and beating the dirt out of clothes are fortunately not the custom in America where washday is the world's easiest — thanks to plenty of running water, washing machines and special new detergents scientifically designed for the really tough jobs in the family wash. Progress in lightening washday burdens, however, came slowly over the years. First running water in homes did away with the need for toting the water in from the pump or well. Then came the washing machine to relieve women of the physical drudgery of rubbing the dirt out of clothes. Now, according to a recent survey, more than two-thirds of all American homes have washing machines.

One of modern science's latest contributions to America's washday is a special heavy-duty detergent recently perfected after more than 19 years of research and development. Research scientists at Procter & Gamble's Cincinnati laboratories call the new product one of the most important discoveries in more than 100 years of soapmaking. The new detergent, being introduced in this area under the trade name Cheer, was specially designed to do the really tough jobs in the family washing — to get out the greasy, ground-in dirt.

The small fry will prize these tot-sized trinkets. They're wonderful gifts for all the babies on your list.
