Returning Scientists Prove Meteor Gouged Chubb Crater

Dr. Victor Ben Meen, geologist who returned to his Toronto home August 23 after four weeks at Canada's Chubb Crater, has reported finding conclusive evidence that the crater was caused by a meteor smashing into the earth from outer space.

Proof of the crater's meteoritic origin had been sought for nearly a month by Dr. Meen, leader of the National Geographic Society-Royal Ontario Museum Expedition working at the crater site on the sub-Arctic wasteland of northwestern Quebec. A prime objective of the expedition, the evidence establishes the crater as the largest known meteor-gouged scar on the face of the earth.

Only at the 11th hour of the field visit, Dr. Meen reports, did the big, round, lake-filled hollow in the hard granite of the peninsula between Hudson and Ungava Bays surrender its centuries-old secret.

Three weeks' work with nine detectors and other specialized equipment had produced nothing conclusive, judged by exacting scientific standards. As the vanguard of the region's sub-zero winter weather began to close in, the expedition scientists intensified their magnetometer survey of the seven-mile-round crater rim. In the final 48 hours before their flyaway, August 23, they came dramatically upon the presence of a "magnetic anomaly" under the eastern portion of the pushed-up crater rim.

A "magnetic anomaly," Dr. Meen explains, is a scientific term for a magnet-indicated underground metal-bearing mass. In the glacier-scoured, granitic region of the Chubb Crater, it constitutes proof of iron-bearing meteoritic material.

Caussu made its appearance as a possible source of wax when a shortage of natural wax began to be felt in 1941. At that time an expedition was sent to South America to search for wax-producing botanicals. Along the Amazon a tremendous supply of the so-called "big leaf" or caussu plant, was found. For centuries the natives had been using the "big leaf" as wrapping material for their food stuffs, for woven baskets used by the fishermen, and as sun and rain shades over their canoes. In American homes, waxes are used on many different types of surfaces to give them added protection and beauty.
