Mechanization Helps Farmers
Do Chores Easier and Faster

By IRA MILLER
Farm Electrification Bureau

Farming operations look pretty complicated these days. Many farms have more motors and electrical equipment scattered around than can be found in the average small town machine shop. Actually, however, such equipment has simplified, rather than complicated, the farmer's way of life. It has taken over numerous chores formerly performed by manual labor.

Nearly every electrified farm has two or more portable motors on hand to operate various "choring machinery." Motors of from 1/4 to 1/2 horsepower operate such equipment as cream separators, fanning mills, drill presses, emery wheels and small corn shellers, circular saws and feed mixers. Those of from 1 to 3 horsepower operate corn elevators, hoists, pumps, etc., and larger motors—5 to 7 1/2 hp.—run ensilage cutters, crop driers and many other devices.

Motors, which are not an integral part of electric equipment, can be moved from job to job without difficulty. Handles for small motors may be made of two strands of heavy wire, twisted together at the top and covered with a section of rubber hose. The wire is attached to the two top frame bolts of the motor. Larger motors are transported by carts.

Usually, a cart can be built from odds and ends of discarded farm equipment, for instance—handles from a walking plow, wheels from tongue trucks of a horsedrawn disc and the frame from 2-inch bar iron.

Electric power has taken over much of the lifting, loading and moving jobs around scores of modern farms. Elevators, operated by motors of from 2 to 5 hp., are used to fill silos and to move grain and hay into storage bins and mows. Baled hay, elevated to the mow door, can be moved to any desirable position by horizontal conveyors and re-elevated by inclined plane elevators. These handy elevators are easily wheeled around the granary or other buildings to load wagons or to shift produce from place to place.

One Ohio farmer built a 120-foot long, enclosed conveyor to move grain from the granary to his steer feeding barn. It operates with a 2 hp. motor. Another form of "feed mover" is the silo unloader. Located in the top of conventional silos or built into specially designed, commercial structures, they scrape silage into the chute where it drops into feed carts.

And these are only a few of the motor-operated devices on farms today. In fact, it would be hard to visualize an electrified farm whose operator hasn't put motors to use in one way or another to do his chores easier, faster and more economically.
