The Dutch Philosopher

(AS OVERHEARD BY JOHN BOYD)

New York City

Dear Mr. Young:
I and Mrs. Weiss went out this evening to such a famous mutton chop house that George told us about and we ate so much and it took us so long to do it that it was too late to go anywhere else and besides that we were too tired. So when we was back in our room at the hotel I says to Mrs. Weiss, I says, in New York it's too early to go to bed yet so leave us set down and write a letter to Mr. Young and tell him about our trip. And then Mrs. Weiss says why should I do that because we will be home soon in just a few days and you can tell him about it and he could put it in the paper. I says, no, because in the first place he would be too busy running around town after ads to listen to us and in the second place he would probably forget about it when he got back to his office so it would not get into the paper and everybody in town would be wondering what we was doing in the big city, meaning New York.

So Mrs. Weiss says all right go ahead. So I took my pen in my hand as the saying goes and here I am writing to you while Mrs. Weiss is sound asleep in body could hardly realize we had got there. Now, where will we go to first. I says and Mrs. her bed. And now comes the part that is to go into the paper which I have decided to call—OUR TRIP TO NEW YORK CITY

By Mrs. George Espenshade
When we got settled down in our seats on the Pennsylvania Railroad train and was going through Gap, Pennsylvania, I had to laugh when Mrs. Weiss says she wished she had of packed up a little lunch because she was hungry because she had got up so early. So I asked the colored porter if we could maybe still get some breakfast on the train and he says we could in the dining room car which was three cars ahead of the car we was setting in. So we went up there and had orange juice and ham and eggs and toast and coffee. We was way past Philadelphia when we got back to our seats and soon after that we was in New Jersey across the Delaware River where there wasn't much scenery to look at and finally we was in New York. We got one of them red hats to carry our suitcases and he got us a taxicab and in a few minutes we was in the hotel and setting in our room. It all happened so quick that a Weiss says, my land, Mrs. Espenshade are we going out right awpy and I says sure, we didn't come to New York City to set still in a hotel room. We could of done that at the General Sutter, I says, so we went out. We had only walked a couple of minutes until I saw a big sign that said Gimbel's so I says, leave us go in here for a couple minutes and see what they have. So we went in and you can imagine what happened after that. It was supper time when the store closed and we went out. After supper which cost us over two dollars apiece even though we did not eat much like at home, we bought a newspaper to see if anything exciting was going on in the big city. There was so much in it that we could hardly decide where to go, so finally I says to Mrs. Weiss, did she ever see one of these here big symphony concerts and she says no she didn't but she would like to, so we got a taxicab and went to the famous Carnegie Hall. We had to set down and rest three times before we got up to the dizzy heights to where our seats was at, but we finally made it and heard the concert. After it was over, Mrs. Weiss says to me that she did not enjoy the pieces that was played so much, but she was glad we went because now she could always say she had been to this Carnegie Hall place and heard a real symphony orchestra which I thought was a real cute statement because many times people go to such things once in their lives just to say oh yes, I have been there quite often. After that we was both so tired out that we went to the hotel and went straight to bed without going to any all-night club which we had thought of doing.

The next morning which was a Tuesday Mrs. Weiss woke me up and says it was time to order our breakfast sent up and after I looked at my wrist-watch I says, you don't mean breakfast, you mean lunch because it was after twelve o'clock noon.
After we got dressed and ate our lunch it was two o'clock and then we spent the afternoon at Macy's store where everything it supposed to be cheaper than anywhere else. Then we had our supper at a Italian place that George had told us about and after that to the Radio City theater. It was quite a show compared to what a body can see in Lititz. The next day which is today, we got up early and went to John Wanamaker's store. And in the afternoon we walked all the way up Fifth Avenue to Central Park looking in the shop windows without buying anything and when it got dark we went to the mutton chop house like I said. Now we are back at the hotel.

It has not rained or snowed yet so we have not bought any galoshes or umbrellas, but it looks like both of us would have to buy another cheap suitcase a piece.

Love to all from
Mrs. George Espenshade
P.S. I am sending enclosed a postal card picture of the hotel with such an x marking our room on the eighteenth floor.

Inscrutable Red

This masklike, tight-lipped, unsmiling face belongs to Georgi N. Zarubin, the new Soviet ambassador to Washington. Calling the Soviet diplomatic service "a frightened corps of puppet caricatures," an article in January's Cosmopolitan magazine says Zarubin and his colleagues have good reason to be robots. The former Soviet ambassadors to France, Germany, and Spain all have been executed; the Red envoy to Japan committed suicide; the first Soviet envoy to this country was imprisoned; and Ivan Maisky, former ambassador to Great Britain, was recently denounced in an ominous manner by Moscow. Zarubin himself received his diplomatic training with the former ministers to Lithuania, Finland, Norway, and Rumania—all of whom have been purged by the Communist government.
