There's also a limit to HOW COLD your milkhouse should be

A cool milkhouse, sure! But a sub-freezing one? ... no sir! That's why the first signs of winter are your signal to install an electric milkhouse heater and set it to automatically maintain milkhouse temperatures at about 40 degrees.

At 40 degrees, you can be sure that damp milkhouse floors aren't going to turn icy. Hot and cold water lines aren't going to go out of business. Motors aren't going to turn sluggish. And ... it's going to be a lot more pleasant working, anyway you look at it!

Ask your PP&L Farm Representative how you can make your milkhouse safer and more pleasant. Then have your local farm equipment dealer install an electric milkhouse heater before winter weather sets in!
