State Deaths Still Rising From Livestock

Deaths from carelessness with livestock are still occurring in Pennsylvania in spite of the decline in the state's horse and mule population and the elimination of bulls from many farms by artificial breeding, declared Allen Baker, 4-H Club Leader, Penna. State University.

"Such accidents claimed five lives in the state in 1953," the 4-H leader emphasized, "on the basis of records by the Division of Farm and Home Safety Education, State Department of Public Instruction. Three of the accidents happened on horses. One victim was kicked by a horse, another was thrown by his mount and a third was crushed by a horse after the animal stumbled and fell on him. A fourth victim was kicked by a cow and the fifth was dragged to his death by a bull while the animal was being unloaded. All these accidents could have been prevented by doing things the safe and smart way."
