Baby Chicks Get Benefits . . .

When Differences Develop on Brooding

By IRA MILLER
Farm Electrification Bureau

Some folks say that differences of opinion help make the world go round. They also are leading to the creation of man-made environment so stimulating to baby chicks that it must come as a decided shock to them to outgrow their early "electrical" care.

Several years ago chicks arrived from hatcheries to begin life under electrically-heated, hover-type brooding.

in the floor or laid on top of it. In the latter case farmers will need a concrete floor or a tight wooden floor to keep down heat losses and to maintain an even temperature under the hover.

Tests show that a 120-foot heating cable unit, operating on 240 volts, will heat a floor area of about 25 square feet—enough space for from 400 to 500 chicks. A 60-foot unit will operate on 120 volts and heat 12 1/2 square feet of floor area.

Many farmers build their own

ers, which included everything from thermostatic controls to built-in ventilation fans. Some agricultural engineers, however, thought that electrical brooding methods could be improved. So, infra-red lamps came into use in brooder houses.

In this latest trend, farmers often install 250-watt lamps per unit to brood 500 chicks. The lamps are placed in pairs, with each pair about 24 inches apart and suspended a minimum of 15 inches above the litter. Two water-type thermostats are used per unit.

Other poultrymen have stuck by the hover-type brooder, with at least one major variation. This consists in the use of heating cable installed under the brooder. Cable is imbedded

"heating cable" brooders, making them 12 inches high, 2 1/2 feet wide and 10 feet long. The brooders have two 15- or 25-watt "attraction" lights located approximately 2 feet in from either side. Three sides of the brooder are closed with insulation board. The front has a curtain which hangs down to within 2 inches from the floor. A sheet of insulation board is placed under the top boards which also should have provisions for two adjustable air vents. Each brooder has a thermostat. Operating costs vary according to weather conditions. However, in one typical test 1,336 kwh. of electricity were required to brood 2,000 chicks in four "heating cable" units during a recent early February to April season.

Farm Calendar

EARLY PULLETS PAY —

Those early-hatched pullets are the ones which will produce the high-priced eggs, reminds Robert Lauffer, Penn State extension poultry specialist. To produce large eggs in quantity during the high-priced months, July-December, chicks must be started in December, January and February.

USE HEAT LAP—Use of some kind of heat lamp to keep baby pigs warm is becoming a common practice on most farms, reports Dwight Younkin, Penn State extension livestock specialist. Swine growers know that they can keep more pigs alive if they get some additional heat during those first critical hours of a pig's life.

PROVIDE AMPLE SPACE — A better job of brooding will result if the poultryman considers the relationship of size of brooding quarters and floor space per chick, number of chicks in the brood, and season, says F. H. Leuschner, Penn State extension poultryman.

APPLE SALES INCREASE — A study of 12 Pittsburgh self-service super markets, in which the Pennsylvania State University cooperated, showed 5-pound bags increased sales by two-thirds more than when apples were offered only in bulk.
