Air Cooled Future Is Here To Stay

By 1955 your air conditioner may be as common a factor in your life as your refrigerator.

In 1940 only 11,450 room air conditioners were manufactured; in 1953 more than one million, according to studies by Electrical Merchandising Magazine. Within 10 years, one New York realtor says, the non-air conditioned house will be absent.

Aside from its effect on the value of your house, air-cooling living within the immediate future may also make as profound changes in your day-to-day living habits as the advent of television. A spot survey made by House & Home Magazine, of owners of air-conditioned homes in the Southwest led to these conditions:

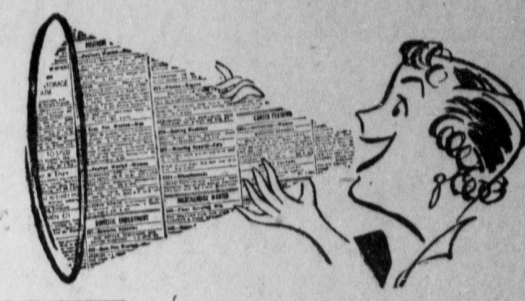

As central air-conditioning and unit room air conditioners come into widespread use, you and your family are likely to react thus during the hot summer months:

You will stay at home more often where it is cool instead of flocking to the beach, the mountains, the crowded highways for relief; adjust your schedule to the fact that your children will prefer to play indoors in the hot afternoons; find that outside noise at night no longer distracts your sleep, because your windows and doors will be closed; do more work during the 'dog-days' because you will feel like working; use your electrical appliances more for the same reason.

In trying to use some appliances simultaneously on the same circuit with a room air conditioner that CAN be operated on a general purpose or small appliance circuit, there is a good possibility of an increased burden on your wiring system. Is your wiring up to the job?

The National Adequate Wiring Bureau advises that you check to see whether your existing branch circuits can handle an added load. Size of a room air conditioner indicates the load it will place on your present wiring system.

Most older houses furnish current for such equipment from 115-volt branch circuits of size #14 wire. A 1/2- or 1/2-ton unit rated at 115-volts may be used on such a circuit provided it is not also loaded down by other high wattable devices. If it is so overloaded, the home owner will be plagued with blown fuses or tripped circuit breakers. As his cooling unit labors under a reduced voltage, it will be unable to do the job expected.

The most popular units are 3/4-ton and above, and these are made to be used on either 115-volt or 230 circuits. The latter demands a separate circuit of large wire (#12—in the long run the best guaranty of trouble free operation for room air conditioners of any size.
