PENCIL AND PAPER CAN PROVE VALUE OF CROP IMPROVEMENT PRACTICES

Farmers who are skeptical of the value of farming recommendations from their state experiment stations, including the use of blue tagged certified Pennsylvania hybrids and certified seed of the small grain varieties, need only keep their eyes on their pocketbook. A stub of a pencil and a scrap of paper should do the rest, according to a recent report by the United States Department of Agriculture.

In an exhaustive study to determine the real value of crop improvement practices, agricultural economists and soil scientists in Michigan, found that thought the cost of using these Experiment Station recommendations is higher per acre than doing without them, the increased yields and better quality product make the cost of producing a bushel of corn or small grain much lower.

According to their report 26 bushels of wheat produced without using Experiment Station recommendations cost $40-.05 per acre. The use of Experiment Station recommendations, including proper fertilization, blue-tagged certified seed, and weed control, resulting in 47 bushels of wheat being produced on the same acre at a cost of $60.65 a bushel.

That means that the farmer that refuses to use crop improvement practices produces wheat at a $1.54 cost to himself, while the one that uses the recommended practices produces es his wheat at $1.29 a bushel - a saving of 25 cents, according to the report.

The survey also showed that use of all recommended practices made possible a 10 cent per bushel saving in corn production and a 30 cent per bushel saving in the production of oats.

Don't take their word for it; check your own production this summer and see for yourself, Pennsylvania Crop Improvement Officers urge.
