FCDA Expects Homes To Have Warning Devices

Engineers working with the Federal Civil Defense Administration now are convinced that within the next few years, 99 percent of American homes can be equipped with a warning signal to alert families of enemy attack or a civil defense emergency.

Research funds for a home-warning system were made available for the first time under the current FCDA budget, although studies in this field have been underway almost from the time civil defense was first organized. FCDA's Warning and Communications office has long recognized that the present system of siren warnings is not completely adequate in that it cannot reach all areas and that the sirens are not always audible to many people who are indoors.

Since the goal is to alert 100 percent of the population in times of possible danger, it is accepted that an indoor signal must be developed which will supplement the outdoor sirens, or warnings broadcast by radio.

The Michigan study concluded that a system could be developed that would warn more than 99 percent of the people in any target area, at a moderate cost. It suggested that the plan of using electric power lines was the best of the systems suggested and that such a system was technically possible. The study pointed out that factors other than technical or economic will enter into the feasibility and effectiveness of any warning system and suggested that a large scale test should be made.

The home signal device would be priced under $10, and would use a negligible amount of electrical power. One of these devices has been successfully tested on a small scale.

Now that funds have been made available to FCDA for research on this project, it has been given top priority rating. It is hoped that research and preparations can be completed during the present fiscal year and that during the next fiscal year full scale tests can be completed in a number of large cities. If these tests prove satisfactory, home warning systems can be then be made throughout the nation.
