Motorists Face Triple Threat
In Winter Weather Driving

Harrisburg—With the coming of cooler weather, necessitating the closing of car windows and the utilization of car heaters, motorists again are warned by the Pennsylvania State Department of Health concerning the danger of carbon monoxide poisoning resulting from parking behind another car whose motor is running.

Many late model automobiles have fresh air and heat intake vents located at the front end of the vehicle in a position where it is possible to pick up the exhaust fumes from the car ahead.

Tests made by the Health Department's Bureau of Industrial Hygiene have demonstrated that dangerous concentrations of carbon monoxide can be produced inside a car so equipped and with windows closed when parked closely behind another car. The exhaust fumes of the car ahead may be forced directly into the vents of the one in the rear. Heavy concentrations of carbon monoxide have been detected. These are sufficient to cause unconsciousness and even death after prolonged exposure.

Motorists are advised to keep vents closed when parked behind another car or when driving in heavily congested traffic areas.

These warnings supplement earlier precautions urged by the State Health Department concerning winter-time driving.

Motorists should be extremely careful when it is necessary to have automobile windows closed. Carbon monoxide from faulty exhaust systems or certain types of car heaters may seep to the inside of the car and build up to such concentrations as to be harmful or even fatal. Motorists are advised to have exhaust gaskets and mufflers checked for leaks before cold weather sets in.

Car motors never should be warmed up in a closed garage. The garage doors or windows should be opened before starting the motor and preferably the car should be warmed up outside the garage in the open air.
