CONTEST

ents—possibly as keen and resourceful as yourself—are striving diligently for that same objective.

It truly means something to win in competition of this kind. It is a demonstration of a capacity that is extraordinary. It proves among other things, a winning personality and the possession of a wide circle of loyal, true friends. Further, it demonstrates that happy faculty of salesmanship and promotion.

Sometimes it "proves up" the false in your bogus friends, but it reveals the true ones and it always tests your own mettle and measures with an unflinching yardstick that invaluable attribute of fortitude.

Final Warning

As a final warning—do not underestimate the strength of any competitor. Over confidence has lost many a battle and it would be far, better to win the prize you desire by a million or more too many votes (representing just a few groups of full-limit subscriptions) than to lose by that fatal narrow margin. You would never forgive yourself if such a miscalculation were to happen to you.

To those who have procrastinated, stop a minute and think of what the completion of your promise might mean to your favorites! NOW, before it is forever too late, call him or her on the phone and make good that promise won't you?

It might be a physical impossibility for the earnest, hard-working contestant to get around in person to see everybody during the short remaining time of this contest.

Each of them have a large number of unredeemed promises to subscribe. Many of these promises were made in good faith, but they won't help a bit unless you do something about it.

Likewise, many have "said in their hearts" that they intend to take advantage of that liberal money saving offer by extending their subscription during the contest and giving some worthy contestant the benefit of the BIG votes allowed thereon, but mere good intentions are worse than useless unless acting before it is too late.

May we suggest, therefore that you get in contact with that friend right now—this very minute—and tell him or her that your subscription is waiting; or better still, send check to cover in mail today.
