Farmers Warned Of Sleeping Sicknesses

A warning against the approaching dangers of sleeping sickness in horses and mules was issued today by the American Foundation for Animal Health.

"This condition is spread by biting insects, and with a build-up in insect numbers occurring now because of warmer weather, prompt action should be taken to protect horses and mules against this disease," the Foundation says.

Vaccination by veterans is the only sure way of preventing the disease. Horses of all ages should be vaccinated each year, since firm protection lasts for only one season. In addition to the vaccination program, veterinary medical officials suggest keeping the animal away from low, swampy areas and instituting good insect control programs.

"The symptoms of sleeping sickness resemble those of heat stroke, rabies and some other ailments, making an accurate veterinary diagnosis of great importance," the Foundation says.

"Losses may run as high as 60 percent in a group of unvaccinated animals. Afflicted horses and mules should be isolated under insect-free conditions so mosquitoes and other carriers cannot spread the disease further."
