Reich's Church Was Built In Adversity

The building now known as Reich's Church came to be erected under somewhat adverse circumstances. Devout persons from Maytown and the surrounding community frequently congregated at a place about one mile west of Maytown, under several large white oak and hickory trees, to hold worship services. Soon a pulpit was erected under the largest tree, then called the "big tree." This tree still stands to the southeast of the church building.

During the worship services, there was often interruption caused by community rowdies who did not hesitate to use ministers and worshippers as targets for their missiles whether they were stones or tomatoes. Early in 1856, motivated by an inner urge to provide a more convenient and a safer place for worshipping, Martin Peck solicited Maytown and the community for funds; thus was the project of financing the project met by the thrifty Maytowners and the substantial farmers of the vicinity. The one-story brick structure, almost as we see it today, was then erected. Appearing above the door on a marker is the inscription: "Union Bethel, Superintended by Martin Peck, September 8, 1856." About 6 years after this date, Martin Peck sold the church property to Conrad Zeigler and moved to Ohio.

Official records show that on January 4, 1878, Conrad Zeigler sold the church property to Harmon L. Reich. Since Mr. Reich was a member of the Evangelical faith at the time of transaction, the name of Reich's Evangelical Church originated, although one occasionally may hear the place referred to as 'Peck's Meeting House.'

Through a misunderstanding at a recent accident the local ambulance was not called. Rumors had circulated among townspeople that state policemen may only call hospital ambulances. This statement was found to be not true. State policemen at the meeting announced that they felt the system used by the local ambulance officials was excellent. They were especially pleased to know that the Mt. Joy ambulance never goes out without a doctor and that it has in operation a 2-way radio system.
