Stinger Removal Disarms Queen Bee

To keep two queens laying eggs in the same beehive, cut off their stingers, suggests E. J. Anderson, apiarist at the Pennsylvania State University Agricultural Experiment Station. The queen that he is working on, rendered unconscious with carbon dioxide gas, is in the plastic receptacle at the point of his scissors. The operation, which is about as painful as cutting one's fingernails, will keep her from stinging rival queens to death. Obviously, Anderson says, two or more queens could build-up colony population much faster and earlier in the season than one. Fruit and field crops would be more effectively pollinated and a larger honey flow would result. Problems have arisen but use of multiple, stingerless queens per colony will be further investigated this summer.
