Quality Important in Potato Chips Face Fly Control Is Developed

Quality of potato chips is determined in part at the Pennsylvania State University Agricultural Experiment Station by means of this fat extractor. Consumers are sensitive to fat-soaked or discolored potato chips. F. J. McArdle, of the Fruit and Vegetable Processing Laboratory, points out. Variety, weather conditions, amount and kind of fertilizer used, area and soil type in which the tubers are grown, conditions of storage and probably other factors affect the quality of potato chips. Potato samples are obtained annually from demonstration plots in eight Pennsylvania counties through the cooperation of Elmer Pifer, extension agronomist.

The face fly is a relatively new pest to livestock producers in the United States and until new chemicals were developed the flys have had their own way. Recently three materials have been developed to help take care of face flies, according to university entomologists.

The three treatments include pyrethrins with MGK repellent; pyrethrins with tabatex; and DDVP bait. Application should be made as directed on the label of the material used specialists advise.

The flies are black and slightly larger than house flies. They cluster on the faces, around the eyes, nose and lips of cattle.

When large numbers of face flies attack cattle they can cause a serious drop in milk production with dairy cows or weight losses in beef of cattle. Many cases of pink eye in dairy and beef herds in the county have been reported recently. Evidence seems to indicate that the infection, as well as some other eye diseases, is spread from one animal to another by the face fly.
