Use Superior Sires Don't Cull Low Producers

Experiment records indicate during their best production that production by the ducton year. These daughters of low-producing sires ranged in production from 200 to 900 pounds, with an average of 693 pounds. Herd average in a few years transmitting the 194 daughters of cows sires are used. On the basis that produced less than 650 pounds of butterfat during their best years.

This long-term experiment covered eight generations of uncullled, unselected cows. Only sires were selected. All heifers were raised and developed, regardless of their appearance or producing ability. They were housed and managed uniformly during the entire test period. Use of proven sires resulted in rapid improvement in butterfat production (this basis of comparison in the herd) for the first five generations. The herd's yearly Col-fat production increased from an average of 530 lbs. per cow to 703 lbs. in the first five generations, but increased to only 711 lbs. in the last three generations.

Transmission of production characteristics from dam to daughter is not always consistent, test records show. Even when using proved bulls, the highest producing cows do not always have the highest producing daughters. In the experiments only 15 per cent of the daughters attained the same production class as their dams. There were 193 daughters of cows that produced more than 650 pounds of butterfat.

The Bulletin, Mount Joy Thursday, February 16

Some of the cows are being mated to the very best Holstein proved sires in the U.S. and Canada through artificial insemination. Formerly, the herd sires were limited to bulls at the Agricultural Research Center or in nearby artificial insemination organizations. By searching over most of North America for sires, the USDA scientists hope to find some whose genes will amplify the production characteristics of the herd.

Another new experiment involves the use of the best sires of other dairy breeds to find out if cross-breeding will increase production in the herd. Still another experiment involves use of selected progeny-tested bulls, which are off-spring of the Beltsville cows. In these experiments, production comparisons will be made on the basis of whole milk rather than butterfat production.

The Beltsville Holsteins are now among the highest producing uncullled cows in the world. New experiments are underway at Beltsville to see if further improvement in herd production is possible. A search is being made also for breeding methods that will increase their production.
