Educators View 'Spanking' Idea

There was a time, says Education U S A" when the board of education was about three inches wide, three feet long, and hung behind the door in the principal's office.

The day of the paddle—or at least the palm—may come again, says the National Education Association newsletter in a report on school discipline.

It notes a trend back to some corporal punishment as partial answer to school troublemakers. Though only one state, New Jersey, has a specific law against it, many cities do.

It's not that teachers plan to spank much, says Washington (D.C.) Superintendent Carl Hansen. But, he says, pupils toe the mark more when they know the legal power exists.

Such discipline is usually more common in elementary schools, with high schools preferring suspension or expulsion as better remedies.

Somebody figures out that the average girl spends $5.00 a week on cosmetics. That is money well spent, in most instances.
