Plastic Mulch Prevents Weeds

Home gardeners can improve the size and quality of their vegetables, fruit and flowers by using black polyethylene plastic film from a roll for mulching, a new method which has paid off for commercial growers. Black polyethylene cuts out all light, protects young trees, flower and fruit plants—as well as their roots—from cold, heat, drought or weeds. It completely eliminates hoeing. Less fertilizer is required, because the plastic minimizes loss of nutrients by rainfall.

Gering Plastics reports horticulturalists found that fruit and vegetables, mulched with the opaque film, are generally of better quality. Tomato plants are larger, firmer and have fewer defects. Strawberries come into production eight to 10 days earlier. There are fewer culls, and no soil rot, because the fruit is kept off the ground. Birds appear to do less damage where the plastic is used. A square of black polyethylene, 4 x 4 feet or larger, can be used around newly set fruit trees, rose bushes, or shrubs to control weeds and grass. This helps new plantings get off to a better start.

Soil should be prepared in the normal manner and fertilized before the polyethylene mulch is applied. Beds should be firm, smooth and slightly crowned so that the water will run off the plastic. Soil shoveled along the edges of the film will keep it anchored. Slits are made in the polyethylene with a razor blade to set in the plants. Black film absorbs heat, and plants must not remain under the hot unsplit material for any length of time.

With very small seeded crops like beets, carrots or radishes, it is more practical to wait until the crop is up, then to place strips of the opaque plastic on both sides of the row.
