THE MONTH of February might well be used as a planning month to prepare for the new growing season. Most farmers have had time to study their farm records since last fall and should be in a position to plan ahead on the basis of last years performance and records. We urge careful planning for every farm enterprise in order to know what is to be done and the time it should be done. Good farm management requires considerable planning in order to become organized and to meet high production costs.

VEGETABLE gardeners have only about six weeks to go until there may be some onion and pea activity (weather permitting). This means that if a soil test is to be made on the garden soil before spring planting, it should be taken and sent to Penn State in the near future. A complete soil test on the home garden or truck patch is a good investment to learn of the immediate needs in relation to lime and fertilizer. Don't wait until warm weather arrives and then be delayed because of the late soil test.

WHEAT producers who are after a maximum yield of wheat per acre and who are not seeding the land down to clover or alfalfa, should consider the top-dressing of the field with a nitrogen fertilizer early in March. The application of from 30 to 50 lbs. of actual nitrogen per acre (may go higher on Redcoat) will increase yields and straw tonnage; this should be done about the time spring growth starts.

GROWERS of alfalfa or red clover who are planning to broadcast seed in winter

Mrs. Mary Wolfe and grain, should be planning to do this job during late February or early March. Research work shows that the early spring broadcastings are more successful than the late spring seedings. Broadcasts made during late March or April have not gotten the stands of the early seedings. We also urge that the legume seed be well inoculated with the proper bacteria in order to obtain the nitrogen-fixing benefits from healthy legumes. If the seeding is to be made with a band seeding attachment on the drill, then the grower should wait until the ground dries sufficiently to carry the farm machinery.

LOCAL dairymen are reminded of the importance of properly developing heifer calves for herd replacements; this takes special quarters and special attention in order to get maximum growth by breeding age. With the greater production per cow expected in these times, the turnover in the milking herd will become faster; this will mean a greater number of replacement heifers will be needed. Also, we are aware of the trend to breed heifers to freshen at still younger ages; this can be done if the heifers are well grown and healthy. Larger cows are very much in demand both in the show ring and in the milking herd; it is important to get most of this growth before they freshen for the first time.
