Once It Was A Fishing Stream

One of our favorite spring occupations used to be walking along the nearby stream to greet fishermen and inspect their catches on the opening day of the season. This excursion is no longer possible; the state gave up stocking the stream a couple of years ago when they discovered fish could no longer survive in the increasingly polluted waters. The fault is not easy to assess. Homeowners blame several new industries up-stream; the industries, in turn, point the finger to sewage seepage from homes built in recent years along the stream banks.

Despite massive nationwide efforts to correct pollution, the problem seems to be outrunning the solution. We have seen photographs of detergent suds billowing behind dams and along lake and river shores. We have read of thousands of fish being killed apparently by heavy doses of pesticides washed from farmlands. According to wildlife organizations, the eggs of many declining birdlife species, such as the eagle and the osprey, are rendered sterile by pesticides. Lake Michigan, the source of Chicago's water supply, is now known as a "killer lake" because of the deaths of thousands of water birds—as many as ten thousand in one season. Industrial wastes are suspected. Then there is the matter of air pollution from a host of sources, including radio-active fallout.

We had a recent conversation with a local fisherman who is also a sanitation engineer. His specialty is helping communities design sewage systems which will leave unimpaired the water supply of towns downstream. Commenting sadly on the loss of his favorite stream, he recalled the Biblical injunction to mankind in Genesis to "multiply, and fill the earth, and subdue it." But to subdue the earth, he added, doesn't mean to beat it to a pulp.

Weather Can Be Dangerous

Suddenly changeable winter weather such as we experience in this area at this time of year can create hazardous driving conditions, Keystone Automobile Club warned today.

"Even though the sun may be shining and the morning temperature ideal, road conditions can often be deceiving, said Edward P. Curran, the Club's Safety Director.

"The slightest precipitation during the night, plus early morning temperatures that hover around the freezing mark, often leave patches of ice on the roads. Motorists driving to work, especially those using the suburban roads, should be extra cautious as these spots are sometimes very difficult to detect.

Often a motorist can be on an ice patch before he realizes it and before he can stop or slow down his vehicle.

"Basically, there are two types of icy surfaces: One is a 'rough' ice which results from an accumulation of hardpacked snow. The other is 'glazed' ice, a thin, smooth, glass-like surface. While both are hazardous, the latter can be much more treacherous for drivers. Stopping on this type of surface offers little or no friction to tires. Having to stop suddenly on glazed ice usually 'locks' the wheels and throws a vehicle into a dangerous skid."

The Keystone official gave the following tips:

1. Be on the lookout for ice patches.
2. Reduce speed immediately upon seeing an ice patch.
3. Be careful. Never put yourself in a position that might cause a skid.
4. When stopping on ice, don't jam on the brakes. Pump the pedal softly.
5. Allow as much distance as possible between your car and others.
