The Worry Clinic

by Dr. Geo. W. Crane

Theima realizes that your spoken words are used as a yardstick to measure your educational level. If you thus speak correctly, you will be rated as a college graduate, even if you never finished 8th grade! But many college youth nowadays violate dozens of common rules of grammar, as shown below!

CASE X-443: Theima G., aged 20 is an ambitious dime store clerk.

"Dr. Crane," she asked timidly, after a talk I had made in her church, "I need some advice."

"I never finished high school, 'cause my mother died."

"That left me to look after my 6 younger brothers and sisters."

"But I feel shy in crowds. I don't know what to talk about."

"And I am scared of making bad mistakes in grammar."

"So how could I learn how to speak like a college girl?"

SPEECH SECRETS

First, any of you readers who didn't finish high school, can now do so by correspondence from an accredited institution.

The "American School" at 7 South Dearborn in Chicago thus makes it possible for any intelligent boy or girl, man or woman, to obtain a diploma via correspondence.

But you can learn how to speak as correct English as most of our college students without even a high school education.

For the typical college coed doesn't seem to know the difference between the use of "real" vs. "very."

"That was REAL good," she will exclaim, as do many radio and TV announcers, too!

And many college graduates do not realize that prepositions require the objective case.

Thus, you will hear clergymen with doctoral degrees say "of we" when they mean "of us."

An occasional error can be forgiven, for all of us make typographical mistakes in writing or extemporaneous speech.

But many college graduates routinely say "Give it to you and I" instead of "Give it to you and me."

Other common errors often committed by college graduates are:

"Consensus of opinion" when "of opinion" is superfluous.

"Mental telepathy" when "mental" is likewise excess baggage.

"Raise up the window" when you should omit that "up".

"I don't have none" which should be "I don't have any".

"He has went" should be "He has gone."

"Dark complected" should be "Dark complexioned."

"Who did they send?" should be "Whom did they send?"

"Their noise aggravated me" should use "irritated" instead of "aggravated."

"Hurry and we'll wait on you," should be "wait for you," unless you are a waitress!

"She is laying down" should be "lying down"

If you will correct a few dozen of these flagrant errors in spoken English, you can easily pass for a cultured, college graduate.

So send for my booklet "The Commonest Errors in English," enclosing a long stamped, return envelope, plus 20c.

You mothers can zoom the grades of your children by thus employing correct English during their pre-school years.

So help your kiddies by teaching them correct vocabulary and grammar!

After a child reaches six years, it is difficult for teachers to undo the previous wrong parental speech habits!

(Always write to Dr. Crane in care of this newspaper, enclosing a long stamped, addressed envelope and 20c to cover typing and printing costs when you send for one of his booklets.)

CHICKEN BARBECUE

A Chicken Bar-B-Que will be held in the Mastersonville Fire Hall by the Fire Company on Saturday, Jan. 21 from 3 to 7 p.m.

There will be take-outs only. Graybill Miller will be the barbecuer.
