WASHINGTON REPORT

Congressman Edwin D. Eshleman

16th District—Pennsylvania

The Congress of the United States is much like any business or industry in needing a review and major overhaul of its own internal operations from time to time.

Such an overhaul within the Congress is needed now. It has been more than twenty years since this task was last undertaken through the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946. In the meantime, the number and complexity of problems facing the Congress have grown by leaps and bounds.

There is an obvious need to simplify Congressional operations and make them more efficient—and also, as I see it, to provide a faster flow of comprehensive and at the same time concise information to better help Members form their own judgments on legislation.

A study aimed at doing these things was initiated in March of 1965 when a Joint Committee on the Organization of the Congress was established. In March of this year, the Senate passed a bill including many of that committee's recommendations.

Since then, however, the majority leadership in the House has kept this legislation bottled up in the Rules Committee. Its major objections reportedly are against certain procedural reforms in the standing committees of the House.

While I do not presume from my limited experience to know all of the ins and outs of Congressional committee procedures, it certainly seems to me this bill ought to be brought to the Floor in the near future so that the full House membership can have an opportunity to work its will on it. Too much time has been lost already since the joint committee made its recommendations over a year ago.

Most of the reforms suggested in the bill have my support. These include those of a general nature affecting the committees—such as encouraging more open meetings, assuring adequate staff help for the minority party and providing means to force a stubborn committee chairman to report out a bill once it has been approved by a majority of members.

There is also a proposal to split the House Education & Labor Committee, on which I serve, into two committees—one on education and the other on labor and public welfare. There is not necessarily any logical connection between education matters and labor matters. But on the other hand, I do fear a separate Committee on Education would place far too much emphasis on the government's role in this field and could lead to even more Federal involvement and control over education.

One of the small but significant recommendations is that committee reports on bills be available to all members at least three days before the House votes on those bills. These reports are of great value in presenting all sides of controversial issues. I am told that too often at certain times in the past, the majority leadership has rushed bills to the Floor for
