SELECT The Right Tree

Selecting the right tree for the right use & location is as important as selecting the right workman for home repairs.

The fact that a tree is pretty or that the same kind is thriving in a neighbor's yard is no indication that it will fulfill your needs.

Before selecting any tree, you must have definite answers to two questions:

1. What will be the primary use of the tree?
2. What are the soil and climate conditions of the planting site?

In many cases, you will have multiple answers to the first question, but you must rank them in order of priority. Which is most important to you, shade or privacy, a windbreak or enhancing the beauty of your home?

If the primary purpose of the tree is to enhance the appearance of your house, you need to study the outside dimensions of the house. Tall trees will dwarf a single story house, but you need some landscaping height around a house with two or more full stories.

You should also consider the size of the house in relation to the size of the lot. If it seems to crowd the boundary lines, keep your landscaping low and simple. If there is a considerable amount of lawn, larger trees will give unity to the entire lot.

Many trees can serve dual purposes well. A pin oak grown to maturity, for instance can shade a patio, provide privacy from the eyes of a neighboring apartment building, and add to the beauty of the neighborhood, as well.

Also consider the shapes that would be most suitable to your site. Would you prefer the informality of weeping willow or a sour gum, the roundness of a sugar maple, the slenderness of a Lombardy poplar, or the airy vase shape of an American elm?
