NEED FOR SPECIAL CARE OF DRY COWS

By Max Smith

A recent release from Dr. Sam Guss, Extension Veterinarian at the Penn State university, points out the need for special care of dry cows in order to prevent twisted stomach, ketosis, or some breeding problems. In many cases the dry cow gets too much high energy feed that is ground or chopped too fine for her. The important management practice is to give the dry cow liberal amounts of course hay or other dry matter, and limited amounts of grain or high energy feeds.

Tea was brought to Europe in 1610.

This roughage will keep the rumen muscles more active and keep the rumen larger and in the proper position within the cow's body. Increased cases of twisted stomachs in dairy cows reveal this condition to be worthy of prevention through special care.
