SINGLE PARENTS CAN EFFECTIVELY RAISE CHILDREN

As one of the results of modern society, the one-parent home is becoming more and more common. In 1968, 7,000,000 children or 1 out of 10 in the United States were living in fatherless homes; 6,000,000 were being raised in homes without a mother. And each year, about 6,000,000 children are involved in a divorce.

A single parent can meet a child's needs just as well as two parents—but he has to work twice as hard, points out James E. Van Horn, Extension family life specialist at Penn State, at providing the basic needs of love, acceptance, security, protection, independence, faith, guidance and control.

One responsibility a single parent has is to help the child build an image of the parent that is missing. A mother, for example, should see that the child spends time with men he knows and admires. In the case of divorce, a parent should avoid bitter talk about the other parent in front of the child.

The lack of a two-parent family does not mean there needs to be lack of discipline. Sometimes, however, the single parent who lacks confidence may want to get support from the outside—from a school or professional counselor, for example. If the child has an adult "friend" outside the family, sometimes this person can help guide the child's behavior, suggests Van Horn.

Although unacceptable behavior should not be tolerated, the child in a one-parent family needs a lot of understanding. The parent should try hard to show the child that he is valued. And the child should be encouraged to develop some deep interest such as books, music or sports.

Sometimes, a parent who has no spouse to depend on finds that they're using a child as a substitute. Although companionship between parents and child is a good thing, the parent should not restrict the growing child's independence. He should be allowed to "live his own life" without the parent as a cushion.
