SPECIALIST GIVES ADVICE ON HELPING CHILD STUDY

The entire family needs to cooperate to help students develop good study habits, says James Van Horn, Extension family life specialist at Penn State. All students need a quiet time and place — with no interruptions or confusion.

Provide study areas that are well lighter and quiet. And remember that the time for study is just as important as the place. A child should be rested and relaxed after a day at school. Allow him time for active play before concentrating on homework.

Van Horn suggests that you help him avoid rushing to finish homework before a deadline such as dinner or bedtime. Try to schedule study time so it does not conflict with a favorite activity or necessary function. If possible, plan the study hour for the same time every evening. He will become accustomed to a regular homework time and be more ready to concentrate.

If you have preschoolers in the home, too, arrange a period of quiet play for them during the older child's study period. Coloring or finger painting, reading or listening to a story are good quiet activities. This quiet play gives youngsters a chance to "play" at studying and helps them get in the habit of a study period.

CHILDREN NEED CONTACT WITH OLDER PEOPLE

James Van Horn, Extension family life specialist at Penn State, says you need to encourage your child to enjoy and respect older people. Grandparents and older people can add much to the life of a child. The relaxed attitude of an older person may be comforting to children who seem "on the go" constantly with hard play.

LAUNDRY DECOR

Your laundry room should be pretty and practical, according to Mrs. Helen Puskar, Extension home furnishings specialist at Penn State. Plan the decor of your laundry center as carefully as you would that of any other room in your house. Floor coverings, counter tops, walls and cabinets and cabinet surfaces should be durable yet easy to maintain.

TRACTORS FLIP BACKWARDS QUICKLY

A tractor operator cannot move fast enough to save himself if the tractor he is operating flips backwards, says Extension agricultural engineers at Penn State. Tractor operators should avoid the practice of racing or gunning the engine when the drive wheels are mired deeply. Don't take a chance. Back out.
