IMPROVEMENT

Most of us are convinced that if we would improve our life, we must improve ourself. However, when we study self-improvement methods we may be overwhelmed by a long list of rules to follow, seemingly as difficult as trying to grow a rose, one petal at a time. An easier method is to start an honest search to determine what kind of person you are now and what you would like to become. Many have said, "It's not like struggling to be something that am not, but rather like a process of me becoming me—and my whole life is improved."

APPRECIATION

I want to be a true appreciator — not weighing gifts to see which one is greater. Let me be only thankful for my friends and have no heavy sense of obligation, knowing a gift is free and not alone. By love's equation, I in my turn shall give what is my own. I make no list of things for which I pray, save to appreciate what comes my way.
