WONDROUS

Anyone who is around children very long cannot help observe, somewhat enviously, the way in which a child's mind works. The joyous spontaneity, the curiosity, and the imagination is nothing short of wondrous. A beloved friend of mine told of a time when their family visited Europe. A man approached her five-year-old sister and asked where she was from. 'Kansas,' she replied. "Kansas is two hundred miles wide and four hundred miles long," and with upstretched arms she added, "and it reaches to the stars." It made me want to capture that wondrous childlike spirit, so I could describe my world "reaching to the stars!"

BUILDING

We never just live or exist, we are always building. The cornerstone is laid when we are very young, and the building process goes on. It can be routine and monotonous, but we cannot stop the process. A man asked two busy bricklayers what they were doing. One said with some irritation that he was laying bricks. The other stopped, looked up, and answered, "I am helping to build a building." What are you—a bricklayer or a builder

BIOLOGICAL CONTROL OF INSECT PEST PROMISING

The current hassle over the use of pesticides has focused attention on the research being conducted in the area of biological control of insect pests.

Biological or natural control includes the use of parasites, predators, diseases, sterilization and the use of resistant crops. Insects have a host of natural enemies which constantly prey upon them. Man is attempting to enlist and aid these hosts in the control of undesirable species.

Diseases are being used in insect control. An outstanding example is the application of the bacterial milky diseases against the Japanese beetle.

There are some authorities today who feel that man's continued existence on this planet could very well be determined by the final outcome of his struggle with his insect Science and Management provides an introduction to the interesting world of the insect, its economic importance and management.

LANGUAGE

We often speak of the limiting aspects of language barriers. Usually this means that people of different nationalities have difficulty in communicating. Language barriers arise however, between people who speak the same language and have lived in identical cultures. Among parents and children, husbands and wives, friends and co-workers, good communication may be sadly lacking. We need to understand that our tone of voice, giving our entire attention, trying to understand another's views are all part of the language of communication.

ABSOLUTE

We often cause difficulties for ourselves by trying to make relative things absolute. No person that we know is absolutely the same all the time. No life situation is absolutely permanent and inevitable. No absolute future can be determined. It is helpful to keep in mind that relative conditions are relative, and can be changed. Nothing that has happened in your life in the past can be changed. But nothing has happened in your life in the past that can not be transcended by what you do today and tomorrow. The door is always open for improvement and change.
